If you love the capabilities of the iPad Pro and want to try out Photoshop, both on the iPad Pro and in Adobe Photoshop Sketch, then this app is for you. If you want to use your friends and family's iPads to create graphics and images, then this app is for you. If you're not an artist or designer, or you're just not sure, then this app is not for you. If you are considering an upgrade from Lightroom 4, you can. But if you're not, you should indeed stick with Lightroom. Display is best viewed on the iPad Pro 9.7-inch or larger. The screen does not update, or refresh, while working on the app. This is a major flaw which you're going to need to come to terms with. No other app does this. This means that the display is shooting off wherever you need to see the lines of the Pencil strokes. Because the display doesn't update, the Pencil can show up in any location on the screen. Otherwise, you'd never see the lines of the strokes unless you look closely. I like this feature. It lets you draw much faster and it cuts down on hand fatigue. Muscle memory is very important for app designers. If you're drawing with anything, instead of using the coordinates, you'll soon be making progress. If you think the app is unwieldy, you'll need to get familiar with the app and expect to learn. This software never felt as snappy as Lightroom. It's completely understandable in this instance that Adobe slowed things down, but I've never really had any issues with the performance of Lightroom. It certainly doesn't feel sluggish like it did when I first experienced it years ago. I couldn't tell you the last time I saw anything that would cause Lightroom to perform better, other than an update to a driver in Windows itself.
